NEW QUESTION: 3

After reviewing a company's NAS configuration and file system access logs, the auditor is advising the security administrator to implement additional security controls on the NFS export. The security administrator decides to remove the `no_root_squash` directive from the export and add the `nosuid` directive. Which of the following is true about the security controls implemented by the security administrator?

- A. Users with root access on remote NFS client computers can always use the `SU` command to modify other user's files on the NAS.
- B. Adding the `nosuid` directive disables regular users from accessing files owned by the root user over NFS even after using the `SU` command.
- C. Removing the `no_root_squash` directive grants the root user remote NFS read/write access to important files owned by root on the NAS.
- D. The newly implemented security controls are in place to ensure that NFS encryption can only be controlled by the root user.

Answer: A

Explanation:

If a user has root access, the user can log in with a non-root access account and then use the `SU` (Switch User) command to perform functions that require root access such as modifying other user's files on the NAS.

By default, NFS shares change the root user to the `nfsnobody` user, an unprivileged user account. In this way, all root-created files are owned by `nfsnobody`, which prevents uploading of programs with the `setuid` bit set. If `no_root_squash` is used, remote root users are able to change any file on the shared file system and leave trojaned applications for other users to inadvertently execute. Some unix programs are called "suid" programs: They set the `id` of the person running them to whomever is the owner of the file. If a file is owned by root and is suid, then the program will execute as root, so that they can perform operations that only root is allowed to do. Using the nosuid option is a good idea and you should consider using this with all NFS mounted disks. It means that the server's root user cannot make a suid-root program on the file system, log in to the client as a normal user and then use the suid-root program to become root on the client too.
